Most interactions with Facebook are as simple as browsing through the Newsfeed. Behind this there is a huge amount of technology, such as algorithms that serve ads and information carefully. According to an interview with the Wall Street Journal (paywall) by IOC Timothy Campos, the company is taking a similar approach to management, building tools to make simple tasks as efficient as possible, according to an interview with the Wall Street Journal (paywall) by IOC Timothy Campos. "The best way to make a business process efficient is to automate it completely", said Campos. Everything that can be simplified does, even if it means highly paid engineers do it themselves. It is part of a wider obsession with cost efficiency. The company also makes items such as headphones and keyboards available to ATM employees free of charge. Making an engineer 5% more productive is worth a lot more than worrying about the cost of a new laptop, or even the time it takes to create a complex internal tool, says Campos. In an interview with Quartz last year, the director of New York's Facebook site Serkan Piantino described a culture that embraces this kind of effort. "We have an internal meeting booking system that does a lot of the work automatically, we have internal tools for our review cycles, and they're all great", said Piantino. "People like to design things around people on Facebook and it's something that does us a lot of good internally. For hiring, it is software that automatically matches and schedules candidates and interviewers, and makes it easy to gather feedback. The company has also built its own customer relationship management system. Many of these things are available from outside vendors, from giants like Salesforce for example. Facebook refuses this approach. A «We have discovered that modifying off-the-shelf software would forget to adapt our process to tools," said Campos (paywall). A «We want to do Facing: make our process better, more efficient, faster. Our instruments are built very specifically. "In fact, everything from server repair, parking and parking and parking service personnel and visitor notification gets automation treatment. One thing that is likely not to be available off the shelf is the way the company integrates this software into its entire office. There are giant touchscreens that show the floor plan of a building, as well as conference rooms available and allows people to schedule meetings. The company said the software, called Wayfinder, took the company's internal tools team about two months to build. A tour of the company's new New York offices showed that each conference room has a screen in front to show if it is occupied and for how long. Not being able to find a conference room is just a momentary irritation. But the combination of all these tools has helped Facebook, grow into a very efficient giant and book more revenue per employee than any other technology company.
